

I think that cultural backgrounds and experiences one hundred percent affect how we learn. Certain rules, what we perceive as wrong or right, can totally change what we do. For example, both of my parents worked in computer-related fields. When ChatGPT arose to fame, my parents were very strict about its use and they knew exactly how it worked. I agree with them, it's not a fair way of learning and it steals information from everywhere.

Culture experiences are everything to me. I was adopted, and I hold onto any part of my identity that I can. I was born in Guatemala and I love learning more about it each day. My parents are very different from me but they are still my parents. I live with their culture while still learning my own! It's pushed me to be curious, and at times I'm sad that I don't know much about where I came from, and I know that I might not ever meet my biological mother but that's okay. I like who I am.
